This literature review aims to synthesize key insights from various studies that illuminate the metamorphosis of political entities and their strategies within the context of societal change.

Kwilinski, Dalevska, & Dementyev, (2022). This scholarly work significantly advances the discourse on international political economy, employing a sophisticated blend of historical–logical and dialectical methodologies alongside institutional and evolutionary approaches. In a dynamic exploration of the intricate global transformation processes catalyzed by information networks and financial technologies, the article discerns the meta-theoretical underpinnings within the sweeping tide of the "information society" era. It cogently posits that the international political economy not only serves as a theoretical linchpin but is also pivotal in establishing adaptive conceptual frameworks fostering trust and solidarity among global economic actors. The research delineates socio-integrative trends, delving into the nuanced interactions and functional metamorphoses of international agents amid the currents of integration processes. Advocating for methodological precision, it underscores the necessity of scrutinizing systemic transformations, delineating criteria for social legitimacy, and cultivating conditions conducive to unleashing individual creative potential within the expansive domain of global social capital.

Modelski, (2016). Meticulously dissects the pivotal role of Evolutionary World Politics (EWP), unraveling its conceptual ties to biopolitics and the biobehavioral framework within the realm of human behavior, spanning from individual dynamics to international relations. A distinctive divergence surfaces as the analysis contrasts George Modelski's social-evolutionary approach in EWP against the broader biobehavioral and evolutionary perspectives entrenched in disciplines like psychology and anthropology. The chapter accentuates a nuanced dichotomy between Modelski's EWP project and the evolutionary insights gleaned from the expansive domains of psychology and anthropology, underscoring the potential symbiosis between these analytical paradigms. It posits that the fusion of these viewpoints has the transformative potential to thrust EWP into the forefront of contemporary biological-evolutionary scrutiny of human behavior. Amidst the auspicious prospects, the review astutely acknowledges and navigates the intricacies and challenges inherent in achieving scientific holism, scrutinizing them through the lenses of biopolitics and evolutionary epistemology.

Alford, & Hibbing, (2004). Explore this article posits a compelling argument for the infusion of evolutionary into the realm of political science, asserting its potential to furnish the discipline with a hitherto lacking theory on the ultimate determinants of human preferences and behaviors. The authors contend that political scientists often either overlook or misconstrue the social dimensions inherent in evolutionary theory, challenging the prevailing notion of genetic determinism by underscoring the prevalent theme of nuanced cooperation within contemporary evolutionary theories. Delving into modern biological theory, the article articulates a distinctive perspective, unveiling novel interpretations of political attitudes and public policies. Supported by empirical evidence from studies on autistic individuals and research involving monozygotic and dizygotic twins, the article robustly establishes the pivotal role of genetics in shaping politically pertinent attitudes and behaviors. It advocates for a comprehensive integration of evolutionary insights to enhance our understanding of the intricate foundations of human political conduct.
